Whether you are a full-time professional writer or a hobby writer interested in turning your passion into a career, publishing books can be an attractive goal. The publishing industry is competitive, so it is vital for the search for publishers and find a good measure for your type of material. Follow the guidelines for the presentation to the letter to increase the possibilities of your short history manuscripts to read. Make sure your manuscript is in excellent editorial condition. Try your job to make sure you do not have typing errors and consider hiring an editor to check the use of grammar, continuity and overall flow. Most publishers prefer to see the manuscripts in 12-point type, doubly spaced with your name and page number at the top of each page. Several publishers focus on different specialties, so it is important to send your work to publishers who have experience with stories. If an editor indicates it deals only in children's novels or literature, you are about to waste your time and publisher's time if you send them to work from other genres. The most reliable publishing houses have websites that outline the type of work they are interested in and explain the process of sending. Following these guidelines will take you one step further to be published. A query letter is the introduction to your short history manuscript. The letter should present you briefly as an author, highlight your professional credentials and provide a brief overview of what your short story is. If you are sending a collection of short stories, identify each one separately. Take a look at the types of stories currently on the market and identify works similar in nature to yours, in your query letter because you think your short stories have the potential to reach a similar audience or because your work may be preferable or unique. This will help publishers to earn better better Where your work would potentially fit into the existing editorial landscape. Never send a publisher the only copy of your work and never send your job via e-mail if the publisher requires paper copy and vice versa. Full-length novels publishers generally require three chapters of a book, but Short Story publishers will probably require a synopsis or the entire manuscript. Include a self-speeded and printed envelope so that the publisher can answer you quickly. Include a prepaid mailer if you want to return the manuscript if not selected for publication. Wait at least two months before following a publisher to see if your work has been revised. If a publisher seems to please your stories, but has some areas of interest, be willing to rewrite or review as educated. Publishers have a good idea of those who are their audience to tell, and doing such requests is their way to make your work more attractive to readers. Once upon a time, I didn't "do" brief stories. The only time I read it was for the lesson, and even then, I foreseen the tasks. I, like a lot of people who say not like short stories, found them too abrupt.
