BUFFALO, N.Y. (WKBW) — At Buffalo's Sacred Heart Academy, students are adjusting to learning from home while still following their regular school day schedule. According to Jennifer Demert, Head of School, students connect with teachers through Zoom meetings for each period, either working on assignments or participating in live lessons. The academy has been preparing for this shift weeks ahead of the New York Gov. Cuomo's directive to close schools due to coronavirus. Teachers and staff researched successful online learning strategies from around the world, opting for a synchronous schedule that mirrors their regular bell schedule to maintain a sense of normalcy for students. I really appreciate how we get a normal bell schedule on my iPad so they turn off at the end of each class to help me stay on track. "After four years, it's a familiar routine that senior Brigid Christiano is all too comfortable with." "[It's] basically just a regular bell schedule that we've got ingrained in our brains," says Brigid Christiano.Senior and her sister Samantha both say they like the structure now when so many things have changed."I'm still getting up, following my routine, and going about my day," says Samantha Christiano.Faculty and staff at Buffalo Academy of the Sacred Heart say it's been tough not having those in-person interactions and special school moments."The teachers have been really hardworking on especially for seniors to make sure we can still fit in some traditions," Brigid Christiano said.Buffalo Academy of the Sacred Heart is a highly-rated, private all-girls Catholic school in BUFFALO, NY.
