Examples of script

In this post, we've curated just for you three screenplay examples from each of the five major genres: drama, comedy, action/adventure, thriller and horror Each screenplay example listed below comes in a PDF for easy download and has been carefully chosen by us to represent one of the best examples of a script in that genre. Study them, absorb their storytelling techniques, soak in how the writer gets you to visualize what's on the page and apply what you learn to your own screenplays. Click to tweet this post. 3 drama screenplays. Boogie Nights. screenplay by Paul Thomas Anderson. This script was somewhat controversial... Mark Wahlberg originally didn't want the role, after seeing how Showgirls had tanked. He changed his mind after reading the screenplay. William H. Macy's agent didn't want him to take the part. Macy read the script, loved it, and immediately signed up. Burt Reynolds did the same but later regretted it and fired his agent for recommending the role to him. Forrest Gump. screenplay by Eric Roth / based on the novel by Winston Groom. Whatever you may think of the movie, Roth is one of our generation's greatest screenwriters and this script doesn't disappoint. Just take a look at this gem of a line from the opening page: "And we see a Man, sitting on a Bus bench, reach to pick it up. In his forties, he looks like he smells like fish." Her. screenplay by Spike Jonze. A lonely middle-aged guy falls in love with a Siri-like operating system in the near future. Once Jonze had this great idea, the script must have more or less written itself. Although it is an updated and expanded version of his 2010 short, I'm Here which is also well worth reading/watching. 3 comedy screenplays. The Disaster Artist. screenplay by Scott Neustadter & Michael H. Weber / based on the novel by Greg Sestero and Tom Bissell. Since their 2009 breakout script, (500) Days of Summer, Neustadter and Weber have focused more on book adaptations and this one is the best of the bunch. The script tells the true story of Greg Sestero's friendship with the weird and wonderful Tommy Wiseau and their attempts to make it in Hollywood. Anyone who's writing a script from a novel should compare both for a masterclass in adaptation. Election. screenplay by Alexander Payne & Jim Taylor / based on the novel by Rex Pickett. Behind Sideways this is probably Payne and Taylor's greatest screenplay. Writing comedy is all about making your protagonist make the wrong choices due to their flaw, which is something lead character, Jim, does over and over while battling his antagonist, Tracy Flick. One of the very best comedy screenplay examples you'll find. The Way, Way Back. screenplay by Nat Faxon and Jim Rash. This fantastic comedy/drama script made it onto the Black List six years before being released as a movie in 2013. The inspiration behind the whole script came from an incident in real life—a conversation writer, Jim Rash, had with his own stepfather as portrayed in that soul-crushing opening scene. 3 action/adventure screenplay examples. 300. screenplay by Michael Gordon, Zack Snyder and Kurt Johnstad. Many aspiring screenwriters get stuck wondering how to write a fight scene. Well, here's the answer. With a body-count of 585, there's much to learn in this script on how to write action sequences, hand-to-hand combat and epic battle scenes. A must-read for any budding Action/Adventure writers out there. Aliens. screenplay by James Cameron. The sequel that took Alien into action/adventure territory and away from its horror beginnings. Walter Hill only contributed to the story on this one, not the screenplay, so it's missing his vertical writing style. It's essential reading if you want to master self-contained action sequences. Inglourious Basterds. screenplay by Quentin Tarantino. Whatever you do, don't follow the method Tarantino adopted while writing this script. It took him over a decade to squeeze this thing out. As he admitted, he became "too precious about the page," convinced the script was his magnum opus. As a famous writer/director, Tarantino could afford to write like this. Aspiring writers, of course, are much better off adopting a much more disciplined, even machine-like approach. 3 thriller screenplays. Flightplan. screenplay by Peter Dowling, Larry Cohen, Terry Hayes and Billy Ray. Writing a limited location, self-contained thriller script is often advised as a way to break into the industry. That's exactly what Dowling did with this spin on the classic "loved one suddenly goes missing" tale, found in movies such as The Lady Vanishes, Frantic, and The Vanishing. Pulp Fiction. screenplay by Quentin Tarantino and Roger Avary. "It is impossible to tell where the Young Woman is from or how old she is; everything she does contradicts something she did. The boy and girl sit in a booth. Their dialogue is to be said in a rapid-pace "HIS GIRL FRIDAY" fashion." If you haven't already read what is perhaps the most celebrated screenplay of the modern era, you're in for a treat. Shutter Island. screenplay by Laeta Kalogridis / based on the novel by Dennis Lehane. When talking about Shutter Island, Kalogridis really extolls the virtues of outlining. "I started this extensive outlining process when I was working for Jim Cameron... I found once I'd done it, it was hugely helpful. It's almost like doing an abbreviated first draft." We agree. Especially for a twisty thriller like this in which every beat and reversal must be meticulously tracked. 3 horror screenplays. Let Me In. screenplay by Matt Reeves / based on the novel by John Ajvide Lindqvist. As a writer, it's important to have a strong emotional connection to your work and screenwriter, Matt Reeves, had just that with this modern vampire tale. As he said in an interview, "I wrote Lindqvist and told him that I was drawn to the story because it was a brilliant genre story—which it is—but also because of the personal aspect of it. It really reminds me of my childhood." A Quiet Place. screenplay by Scott Beck and Bryan Woods. This script was written by childhood friends/co-writing team, Bryan Woods and Scott Beck, and was their third major project together. After being named as one of the top 10 scripts of the year on Tracking Board's 2017 Hit List, it was purchased by Paramount and rewritten with John Krasinski. Us. screenplay by Jordan Peele While writing this script, Peele wanted to make sure people weren't confused by the genre, as they had been with his previous movie, Get Out, and write a full-on horror film. Hence, inspiration came from old and new classics of the genre, such as The Shining, The Sixth Sense, Let the Right One In, The Babadook and It Follows. Click to tweet this post. Understanding how to write a film script involves mastering structure, screenplay format, and storytelling techniques. Proper film script format helps ensure that a screenplay is easy to read and execute during production. For those learning how to write a script, knowing proper screenplay structure is crucial. A movie script length typically ranges from 70 to 120 pages, with most feature films averaging around 110 pages. This length is crucial because one page of script format equals roughly one minute of screen time. A strong grasp of movie script format helps ensure your screenplay is production-ready. Understanding how to write a screenplay goes beyond just length—it's about mastering the structure, formatting, and visual storytelling that makes a script effective. In this guide, we'll break down scriptwriting step by step, ensuring you grasp the movie script format and essential screenplay elements like scene headings plot points, and how to format dialogue and action lines correctly.How To Format a ScreenplayMovie script formatting guideTo format a screenplay correctly, follow industry standards that ensure clarity and readability. Every scriptwriter must understand formatting rules to ensure their screenplay is industry-ready. Whether you're using software or doing it manually, knowing how to format script elements properly is essential.A well-structured film script format ensures clarity and ease of production. If you're learning how to write a film script, mastering formatting is key to making your screenplay look professional. This structure is essential for scriptwriters aiming for a professional film script format. So, how do you format a script to meet industry expectations?Here's how to properly format your movie script:Font: Always use Courier font (12-point)—it ensures a consistent page-to-screen ratio where one page equals roughly one minute of screen time.Margins:Left: 1.5 inches (for hole-punching and binding)Right, Top & Bottom: 1 inchLine Spacing: Each page contains about 55 lines, balancing readability and efficiency.Dialogue Formatting: Character names should always be in uppercase, positioned 3.7 inches from the left margin.Character Names: Must have uppercase letters and be positioned starting 3.7 inches from the left side of the pagePage Numbers: Placed in the top-right corner, beginning on page two. These standards ensure that when you format script elements properly, your screenplay will meet industry expectations from start to finish.StudioBinder screenplay software does all the required formatting so you can focus on the creative. Below is a formatted script example that you can click to examine further:Many scripts begin with a transition, which may include FADE IN: or BLACK SCREEN. Professional screenplay writing software ensures your script adheres to industry standards automatically. Some place this in the top left, others in the top right of the page, where many transitions live. If you're learning to format script transitions, keep consistency across pages. Other scripts will begin with scene headings or even subheadings of imagery they want to load.Scene heading (INT. APARTMENT - NIGHT)The scene heading is there to help break up physical spaces and give the reader and production team an idea of the story's geography.You will either choose INT. for interior spaces or EXT. for exterior spaces. Wondering how you format a script that moves from one location to another? Then, a description of the setting, and then the time of day. Here's a screenplay example:There are rare cases where the scene begins inside and goes outside, or vice versa, and in these situations, you may write INT/EXT. or EXT/INT. Some scripts take place all around the world, so often screenwriters will use multiple hyphens to give the scene headings even more detail.This helps the screenwriter avoid having to point out the geographical location in the action lines, saving space to write more about the actual story and keep readers engaged in the story, not the formatting.SubheadingOften, writers will use subheadings to show a change in location without breaking the scene, even if the scene has shifted from INT. to EXT.Here's a script example:It is assumed that readers will understand the change in space while retaining the idea that the time of day is the same - even continuous.The reason many writers do this is to avoid the notion that we've entered an entirely new scene, though you could always include CONTINUOUS in place of DAY or NIGHT by creating an entirely new scene heading.It's a matter of personal style and rthm vs. production considerations. Transitions (FADE IN, CUT TO)In the bottom right of the page, you will place transitions, but in modern screenwriting, these seem to be used less and less. The transitions that seem to have stood the test of time are CUT TO and FADE OUT. Learning how to write script transitions properly helps maintain flow and pacing.Here's a screenplay example: You may also include something like DISSOLVE TO: but these are used less and less, probably for the same reason you avoid camera shots.Character IntroductionsWhen you introduce a character in a screenplay, you want to use all capital letters for the name of the character, then a reference to their age, and finally some information about their traits and personality.Here's a screenplay example:Again, screenwriters have found other ways to do this, but this is the most common and production-friendly way to introduce a character. Understanding how to write script character entries effectively sets the tone for your entire scene. We have a post on how to introduce characters in a screenplay that goes into the creative considerations of introducing characters, so I highly recommend you check it out after this post to learn more.Action (what's happening visually)Action lines are where you describe the visual and audible actions that take place on screen. You want to write in the third person in the present tense.Here's a script example:Often, you can make your script a better read by eliminating redundant pronouns and conjunctions. Big sounds and important objects can be written out in ALL CAPS to emphasize their effect on the story. If you're looking for script writing how to guides that elevate your action lines, this formatting trick is essential.DialogueYour lines of dialogue will be set underneath the character to which they are assigned. Dialogue is pretty straightforward from a formatting standpoint, but it is the most difficult part of screenwriting.Here's a great example to check out:If you want to learn more, check out our post on Screenwriting Tips for Writing Better Dialogue, where I go over a bunch of ways to audit your screenplay for good... and bad dialogue. If you're wondering how to write script dialogue that feels real and purposeful, this is a great place to start.ExtensionsThese occur when a character says something off-screen (O.S.) or if the dialogue is voice-over (V.O.). You will see extensions when a character ends a block of dialogue, performs an action, and speaks more.Here's a script example:This takes the form of continued (CONT'D). Professional scriptwriting software will help you with this, but it will not be able to predict when you want something said off-screen or in voice-over.ParentheticalYou can use a parenthetical inside your dialogue to show small actions or even a change in mood without having to jump out to an action line.Here's a screenplay example:Parentheticals are good for directing actors and adding sarcasm and nuance to performances on the page, but you may want to be cautious about adding them too much. Use them sparingly and only when they help clarify how to format script intent within dialogue. Actors are professionals, and if Al Pacino finds parentheticals in a script, he may get his feelings hurt.Camera ShotsThe best professional screenwriters know how to suggest shots without actually writing in shots, but if you insist on describing a particular shot in your screenplay, you can format it like a subheading.Here's a script exampleThis lets us know that the shot is supposed to be set so that we see things from Fillis's perspective. Writing out shots is often frowned upon, but if you're directing the film, maybe do it sparingly. In these cases, it's helpful to know how to format script directions so they support the visual language of the scene.Story structure is more than just formatting—it's the foundation that turns an idea into a compelling screenplay. While some argue that classic structures lead to formulaic movies, the reality is that structure helps create stories that resonate with audiences. At its core, a screenplay thrives on a strong central conflict that keeps the narrative moving forward.So why does structure matter? Because production companies, studios, and executives rely on it. They've spent years refining the business of storytelling, and most successful films follow some form of classic structure. While not every writer or director follows it rigidly, all professionals understand it.Many frameworks exist, such as Save The Cat, The Three-Act Structure, The Hero's Journey, and The Story Circle. But at a fundamental level, every story follows a progression that reflects the human experience:Exposition - Introduces the characters, setting, and conflict.Rising Action - The stakes increase, obstacles arise & the protagonist is tested.Midpoint - A major turning point that shifts the story's direction.Climax - The tension peaks and the protagonist faces their greatest challenge.Falling Action - Consequences unfold, leading toward resolution.Resolution - The story finds closure, whether satisfying or open-ended.Following this structure doesn't mean sacrificing creativity. Instead, it provides a roadmap that keeps your screenplay focused and engaging.What makes a story work? In this video, writer and story expert K.M. Weiland breaks down the three-act structure using one of the best-structured films of all time — Jurassic Park. Watch as she explores its key moments and reveals how structure shapes great storytelling.One essential tool for structuring your script is a screenplay outline. Think of it as a navigation map for your road trip — keeps you from getting lost. A strong outline includes:Story beats - Key moments that drive the narrative forward.Scene breakdowns - The purpose of each scene and how it connects to others.Page count estimates - Helps maintain pacing and balance.If you're struggling with writer's block, an outline can keep you on track and ensure your story unfolds in a way that makes sense. Plus, producers and studios expect to see a structured approach—they want to know they can bank on your screenplay before investing time and money.Mastering story structure doesn't mean limiting your creativity; it means giving your ideas the best chance to succeed.Before diving into formatting and structure, your screenplay needs a proper title page. While it may seem like a minor detail, it's the first impression your script makes. A professional title page shows you understand industry standards and makes your work look polished.Here's what should be included on a screenplay title page:Screenplay Title Page FormatTitle - Centered, bold, and written in ALL CAPS.Written by - Centered beneath the title, usually formatted as: Written by [Your Name]Based on (if applicable) - If your screenplay is adapted from another work, include: Based on the novel "Book Title" by [Author's Name]Contact Information - Your email or representation's contact info, is typically placed in the bottom left corner.Example of a Proper Screenplay Title Page:Additional Tips:Avoid unnecessary personal information - Unlike in the past, you don't need to include your home address. A designated email for your screenwriting work is sufficient.Use standard formatting - The title page should be clean and simple. No images, no fancy fonts—just professional and easy to read.Keep it to one page - The title page should never exceed a single sheet.A well-formatted title page sets the tone for your script. It's a small but essential step that ensures your screenplay looks professional from the very first glance.Some nuanced screenwriting practices may seem correct but can confuse or hinder the physical production. Thorough pre-production planning ensures a smoother transition from script to screen, saving time and resources.Does this sound familiar? You understand script formatting, but after reading popular scripts, you're more confused. Many screenwriters bend the rules, using format creatively to enhance pace and flow. "Why follow strict rules when top writers don't?" You might be asking, how do you format a script when even professionals bend the rules?Good question. Most scripts you read are early drafts or spec scripts, not production-ready versions. If you want your script to be production-friendly, it's best to write with that in mind.Up NextWrite Your Screenplay with StudioBinderNow that you understand how to write a movie script, take the next step with StudioBinder's screenwriting software. Proper script formatting is extremely important when writing a screenplay for a number of reasons, one of the most important being the timing of the final film. One page of a properly formatting screenplay is equivalent to approximately one minute of screentime. Knowing roughly how long a film will be before it is shot is incredibly important.All screenplays are built out of the same core formatting elements. For a deeper dive into these specific elements and to see how each of them are used, be sure to read our guide to screenplay formatting. Here are a few of the funniest comedy screenplays.Click the image below to read and download the entire script.The 40 Year Old VirginThe 40 Year Old Virgin is an example of a dialogue-heavy screenplay. You will find entire pages consisting of nothing but dialogue in this screenplay which is something you are far less likely to find in other genres. If you want to write a script in the vein of The 40 Year Old Virgin, you should take a look at our tips for writing better dialogue first.Shaun of the DeadEdgar Wright's best movies are great examples of well-balanced comedy screenplays. The mix of dialogue and action is as close to perfect as you can get in a screenplay.(500) Days of SummerThen, of course, there's the romcom. (500) Days of Summer utilizes many of the tropes we know and love from romcoms to build something both funny and emotionally stirring. The romcom wave of the 2000s crested with this movie.Here are a few other great comedy scripts that you can download to inspire you when writing your next laugh-riot.Movie Script ExampleAction script examplesJust as there is a spectrum of comedy scripts, there is also a great deal of variance in the stylings of action movie scripts as well. Action screenplays tend to rely more heavily on action lines than dialogue but this is not always the case.John WickJohn Wick is one film that places a heavy emphasis on action, and, as you might guess, the screenplay reflects this fact. There is a mixture of dialogue and action in the pages of this screenplay with a heavy slant toward action in the ratio. Entire pages of the script go by without a single line of dialogue at times. Keanu Reeves made the cut for our list of the top action stars, and John Wick made it onto our list of the best action films ever made. Find out what else made the cut.Django UnchainedEvery great Quentin Tarantino movie script displays his absolute mastery of the screenplay format. You can download and read the Django Unchained screenplay to see exactly how he structures and formats his blend of intense action with his trademark dialogue.CollateralOn the dialogue-heavy end of the action film spectrum, we have screenplays like the one for Collateral. The dialogue-heavy cab scenes are juxtaposed wonderfully against the sharp bursts of action that occur outside the cab. Collateral has more dialogue and less action than the average action-thriller but is a grade-A action film regardless, showing that the action-to-dialogue ratio can be skewed to great effect in the hands of experts. If you are a fan of Collateral, be sure to check out our review and retrospective on the film.A few more classic action screenplays for you to read:Best horror movie scriptsHorror script examplesThere's nothing better than a scary horror script. How do you know if a horror script is good? You don't want to read it at night.AlienAlien is a watershed moment in horror movies, marking an entirely new terrain in which to scare audiences. But it doesn't just deliver on scares. It's a riveting character study, and its science fiction elements are deeply thought through. That's why entries in the franchise are still being made today.The BabadookThe Babadook is one of the best horror movies of the 21st century. Like Alien, there's more to it than incredibly effective scares. The movie is an examination of a complicated mother-son relationship, and a moving portrait of a woman wrestling with seemingly insurmountable grief. Check out the script- it's all there on the page.The ExorcistWant to read just one horror movie script? This is probably the one. The Exorcist is one of the most popular, influential, horror movies of all time. In addition to William Friedkin's expert direction, writer William Peter Blatty's script is bone chilling.If you want to read more horror movie scripts, here are a few more great options:Drama script collectionDrama script examplesA "drama" can look a million different ways, and so can a drama script. The key is to put character first- why do we care about these people, and what makes them tick? The story will flow out of that.Shawshank RedemptionIt's hard to add anything to the conversation surrounding Shawshank Redemption. There's a reason it's been crowned the greatest movie of all time by IMDb users. Try watching the movie without getting choked up. It's very difficult.Sunset BoulevardAnyone who wants to become a screenwriter must (must!) study the work of Billy Wilder. Few have matched his knack for snappy dialogue. With Sunset Boulevard, Wilder and co-writers Charles Brackett and D.M. Marshman Jr. created an instantly iconic film about the fleeting lights of showbiz, and the toll they take.Taxi DriverLike with Shawshank, what more can be said of Taxi Driver? It introduced many of us to the inimitable Paul Schrader. It's so influential it created a genre unto itself. It's one of Scorsese's finest. You've heard it all before: give it a read.A few more classic movie drama scripts:Sci-fi screenplaysSci-fi script examplesWriting a sci-fi can be daunting. Not only do you need to create compelling characters and story arcs, but you also have to create an entire world. Sci-fi writing is detail oriented, an exercise in building rules for yourself and sticking by them.2001: A Space OdysseyA good place to start with sci-fi scripts is the script for arguably the greatest sci-fi of all time. Kubrick's masterpiece is layered and profound, deserving of multiple viewings (and perhaps readings). His script, written with Arthur C. Clarke, lays the foundation for the top-tier film.ArrivalBefore Denis Villeneuve became the king of big-budget sci-fi with Blade Runner 2049 and Dune, he was the master of the contained sci-fi. Arrival, written by Eric Heisserer, is the pinnacle of this period, beguiling and moving.GhostbustersNot all sci-fi has to be deadly serious. Ghostbusters is a testament to sci-fi which is just fun, filled with laughs and gags. It's also a work that defies genre- we could have just easily called this a comedy, or even thrown it in the horror section. Here are some other great sci-fi movie scripts:Up NextRead the Best Movie Scripts OnlineScreenplays all follow the same formatting guidelines, but each writer leaves their own fingerprints behind on the pages.
