How to add podcasts to android auto. Podcast apps that work with android auto. How to listen to podcasts on android auto.

In 2002, two years before the word "podcast" was coined, I came across an iTunes station that sounded like a ham radio show. Some friends got together every week, recorded an hour or more of their conversation and published it as The Great Radio Tiki Experiment. (The show is long gone, but its archives (Opens in a new window) are still available.) It was one of the first podcasts and I was hooked. Now it seems anyone can create a podcast. Today, the podcast market is so saturated with content that the only way to find your favorite shows, organize the episodes you want to listen to, and listen to them is to download a dedicated podcast app. Recently, some Spotify users began looking for an alternative podcast player app after pleas from the medical community and music legends to stop Joe Rogan from spreading false or misleading views about COVID-19 went largely unanswered. If you decide to leave Spotify, know that the company has some exclusive podcasts, so you won't always be able to find all your favorite shows elsewhere. On the other hand, you may discover new programs that are even better. After testing about 25 podcast players, I've picked nine that either offer a great overall experience or something unique. I have a few personal favorites among them. If you're looking for an efficient podcast player that isn't cluttered with ads and referrals and you only have to pay once, I recommend Downcast for iPhone and DoggCatcher for Android. Pocket Casts takes the cake for a similar experience that is cross-platform. Overcast gets credit for having a loyal and dedicated fanbase for years, as well as having some of the best playlist organizing tools out there. What to look for Almost all podcasts have a few things in common. You should always be able to subscribe to a show to receive new episodes in your podcast feed. You should be able to how much content is downloaded to your device manually or by limiting the number of new episodes downloaded from each show. Some apps also allow you to set a limit on how much memory you want to use. Most apps have an audio enhancement feature that automatically enhances people's voices. Many, but not all, have an air trimmer that automatically disables pauses longer than one or two breaths when turned on. Every podcast app should allow you to create playlists, like a list of shows you listen to every time. in the morning or a separate list of programs stored for the weekend. Start Listening Below you will find the best podcast apps, arranged alphabetically, with images of the mobile apps, their prices and a few words about what makes them special or useful. Price per ad: FreeAcast is a podcast app to listen to shows and an app where creators can publish their content and work with the Acast team to earn money for their work. As a listener, you'll find all your favorite podcasts, even if their creators don't work directly with Acast. The application has the ability to change the region after detecting podcasts. Options include: Australia, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Norway, Sweden, UK and US. When you change your region selection, you'll see new podcast recommendations that are relevant or popular in those areas. Android (opens in new window), iOS (opens in new window), macOS Price: Free; $2.99/month, $18.99/year, $29.99/year for 2-6 family members Castro PlusCastro is a free iOS podcasting app that's pretty average if you use the free version. However, if you upgrade to Castro Plus for $18.99 a year, you get a sideloader feature that lets you download whatever content you want to play, from audiobooks to conference calls found online, to your podcast player. The rest of Castro's features are average, including the mute button, voice booster.the ability to customize settings for each show on your channel and a dark mode. I don't recommend the free version of this app: If you are interested in a Plus account, you can try it one week before paying. Available for iOS (opens in a new window) Price: $2.99. If you're looking for a podcast app for Android that you only have to pay for once (i.e. no subscription), DoggCatcher is your best bet. This app comes with some standard features like variable playback speed, offline playback, customizable playlists and the ability to automatically delete played episodes from your device. But the real selling point is that it's a solid podcast catcher and player that doesn't require you to sign up for special sales, remove ads, etc. Available for Android (opens in a new window) Price: $2.99 for iOS . $4.99 for macOS, one of the best podcast apps for iPhone and Mac. It also works with Apple Watch and CarPlay. You pay once for apps and own them forever with no subscription fees. Podcasts are easy to subscribe to, whether you search for them or search for them, or add them from a channel URL. With extensive settings, you can automatically start your favorite shows after a set number of seconds or end them early, allowing you to bypass long intros or close ads. The list view includes the shows you have subscribed to or downloaded, with details such as: B. how many episodes you have in your queue, when the last episode was released, and an icon indicating whether you are signed in to automatically download the next version. If you're a pure Apple user and don't need a web app, Downcast is one of the best podcast apps out there. Available for iOS (opens in a new window), macOS Price: $11.99/month, $69.99/year for unlimited catalog a fairly standard podcast playback app and service for podcast creators, but now focused on providing "inspiring" content with a learning biasPersonal development. Himalaya offers audio lessons and learning in five to ten minutes. Some examples of program titles are "Think Like a Lawyer", "Changing Everyday Work" and "Mindfulness in Everyday Life". You can download Himalaya for Android, iOS and online. The application belongs to the Chinese company Ximalaya; Some user feedback indicates that content restrictions are common outside of the US, where some content may not be licensed. Available for Android (opens in new window), iOS (opens in new window), Web Price: Free; $4.99 per month or $34.99 per year for original broadcasts. Luminary launched in early 2019 with a beautifully designed app for viewing and playing podcasts and a controversial rallying cry for removing ads from podcasts. Its move: Pay a monthly or annual fee (which has dropped significantly since it originally launched) to get access to real shows. Original shows include stars like Trevor Noah, Lena Dunham, Roxanne Gay, Karamo Brown and more. The problem with Luminary is that some podcast networks are withholding major shows from the Luminary platform, including The Daily, which is presented by the New York Times. Available for Android (Opens in new window), iOS (Opens in new window), Web (Opens in new window) Price: Free; $9.99/year for PremiumOvercast is an iOS-only app with some unique features, the most notable of which is clip sharing. With clip sharing, you can tell someone about a podcast you like by sending them an audio or video clip of up to a minute in length. I also like that you can create playlists for your podcast so that each new episode appears in a list (called a smart playlist) or specific episodes you want to hear appear in a playlist. The free version of the app contains ads and has such significant feature limitations that I don't recommend using the app unless you're willing to pay $9.99/year for premium. Unfortunately, Overcast doesn't give you a trial period for an upgrade either. The app is also compatible with the Apple Watch. Available for iOS (opens newFor free; $0.99 per month, $9.99 per year for Plus. One of the most popular podcast apps, Pocket Casts is free for Android and iOS. It's also available on Amazon Echo, Apple CarPlay, Apple Watch, Android Auto and other platforms, some of which are exclusive to Plus members (macOS, Windows, Web Player). This app has a clean interface and great features. It's easy to see who's on your subscription list and what episodes you've started but haven't finished yet. It features 0.1 steps of increasing or decreasing the speed of sound, allowing you to smoothly adjust the tempo. In addition to accessing some platforms not available to free users, paid members can also access cloud storage and exclusive app icons and themes. Available for Android (opens in new window), iOS (opens in new window), macOS, Web, Windows Price: Free; Premium $4.99 per month or $34.99 per year Stitcher isn't just a podcast app, it's a podcast network. Stitcher is home to over 50 original shows including Comedy Bang! Bang!, How It Was Made, The Dream, Sporkful and more. Stitcher doesn't have the most powerful features or settings for playing podcast episodes, but it does have the basics like a sleep timer, forward or backward buttons for different time intervals, and multiple playback speed options. Plus, you can listen almost anywhere with the Android and iOS apps and web player. You can also play Stitcher content on your Amazon Alexa device, as well as in cars via CarPlay, Android Auto or directly from your smart audio system. Premium membership costs $4.99 per month or $34.99 per year. Available for Android (opens in new window), iOS (opens in new window), Web.
