The automobile has been around for generations, and while you might not think of carmakers as all that innovative, you'd be wrong. In fact, you'd be hard-pressed to find an automaker that doesn't have an office in Silicon Valley these days, says Eric Larsen, who heads up Mercedes-Benz's research and development team in Sunnyvale, California.In an interview with The New York Times, Larsen expanded on some of Mercedes recent tech-enabled steps toward robotic cars and built-in sensors that assist drivers. He also shared his top five expectations for the future of driving. "America has a robust demographic, a higher birthrate than in Brazil or China, and immigration," Larsen said. "And the American lifestyle lends itself to vehicles."People do everything in cars, from sleeping to drinking--and most people spend hours at a time in their vehicles, waiting in traffic or waiting on their kids, Larsen adds. "The personal vehicle is as much a cultural necessity as it is a mode of transportation, and the market for luxury vehicles is as big as ever.He predicts more safety features, better seats, and more green technology in future luxury cars. But Larsen still questions the practicality of electric vehicles. "This part of the model isn't broken for most car owners," he explains. "If electric cars become popular, are they really going to put a charger in every space in the garage?"He also predicts advancements in the "awareness" of car controls, expecting cars that will recognize when they are at rest and allow the driver to sleep or watch TV in the front seat. And outside companies will know much more about how we drive, with phone sensor technology able to track a driver's speed and how tight he or she takes corners.Even private car sharing is a large part of Larsen's vision for the future of the car industry, as Americans become more interested in long-distance transportation, he says, with kids traveling "20 miles to a soccer coach or violin teacher." Larsen adds, "That is a pain point for affluent parents, our customers, people who have more money than time."Mercedes has already created a business called Boost, in which minivans, operating like school buses, drive children to their afterschool activities. The van comes complete with a driver and a concierge, who escorts the child to his or her activity.But people, Larsen stresses, won't be giving up their own big cars. Young people today will still want homes in the suburbs with children and a fenced-in yard. "They fill up a car with kids, dogs, and stuff from big-box supply stores," he says. "That means people will still want big cars." There are several ways to tell us your address has changed: Methods to Change Your Address Method Action Oral notification Tell us in person or by telephone. We'll need you to verify your identity and the address we have on file for you. Please have ready your: full name new address old address date of birth social security number, ITIN or EIN We may request additional information to verify your identity. IRS form Use Form 8822, Change of Address or Form 8822-B, Change of Address or Responsible Party - Business Tax return Use your new address when you file Written statement Send us a signed written statement with your: full name old address new address social security number, ITIN, or EIN Mail your signed statement to the address where you filed your last return. If you filed a joint return and are still residing with the same spouse, both you and your spouse should provide your names, social security numbers, new address and signatures on the form or statement. If you filed a joint return and you now have separate addresses, each of you should notify us of your new, separate addresses. Authorized representatives filing a form or written statement to change an address for a taxpayer must attach a copy of their power of attorney or Form 2848, Power of Attorney and Declaration of Representative. Unauthorized third parties can't change a taxpayer's address. Changes of address through the U.S. Postal Service (USPS) may update your address of record on file with us based on what they retain in their National Change of Address (NCOA) database. However, even when you notify the USPS, not all post offices forward government checks, so you should still notify us. For changes of address relating to an employment tax return, we issue confirmation notices (Notices 148A and 148B) for the change to both the new and former address. It can generally take four to six weeks after receipt for a change of address request to fully process. Revenue Procedure 2010-16 Page Last Reviewed or Updated: 14-Oct-2020 Photo Courtesy: PAUL RATJE/AFP via Getty Images Moving is not an easy task. There are boxes to pack, new items to purchase, furniture to load and unload, and about a million other tasks to handle. One of the most important "to do" tasks? Changing your mailing address. In the past, you'd have to stop by your local United States Postal Service (USPS) office to fetch a change of address form, which likely entailed lines and long wait times. But, fortunately, times have changed. The USPS now offers an online version of the Change-of-Address form, and, while this service isn't completely free, it's certainly not going to be the priciest part of your move. Besides, when there are so many other stressors to worry about, convenience is key. So, how do you get started? Simply, visit the Official USPS Change-of-Address page. Once there, you can access the Change-of-Address form, which entails following a few simple prompts in order to make the switch official. Pro tip: Be sure to have a debit or credit card handy to pay the nominal change fee. Need a more detailed breakdown? Read on — we've got it covered. Photo Courtesy: Brendan Sniadowski/Getty Images After arriving at the USPS Change-of-Address landing page, you'll see a bar consisting of five sections. Each section represents a step in the change of address process. The very first step is identifying who (or what) is moving. Photo Courtesy: Justin Sullivan/Getty Images If you're a single individual, select "individual." If you're a member of a family or household that is moving together, select "family." Is your business on the move? Choose the "business" option. Once that's checked off, you'll need to enter your contact information — name, email address, phone number — into the text fields below. The USPS will use this information to contact you with more information concerning moving savings, complications and other postage updates. At this point, you'll need to select either a "temporary" or "permanent" move type. Often, "permanent" is the most fitting option, unless you're planning to return to your old address in the future. Depending on your answer, you may need to select your move dates and return dates. This will allow the USPS to keep track of your mail and deliver it to the correct location. Photo Courtesy: Scott Olson/Getty Images You'll also be asked when you would like your mail to be forwarded to your new address, ensuring that you won't miss an important letter or bill. Finally, you'll need to fill in your new address. Straightforward enough, right? Best of all, it's all online, which means you won't need to clutter your new home with change-of-address paperwork. Changing your mailing address in-person at a USPS office is typically free of charge. However, changing your address online does cost a little bit of money. Before you can submit your change of address, you'll need to pay a $1.05 processing fee. Photo Courtesy: George Frey/Getty Images That's not a ton of money, especially when you consider that the average local moving costs come in at around $1,250. Saving all that time and energy is likely worth the nominal fee, but it's still something to consider before you submit your form. So, you've let the USPS know about your move — what's next? While you're filling out this kind of paperwork, we recommend updating your driver's license to reflect your new address too. After all, the sooner you get it done, the sooner you can stop worrying about it. Of course, visiting the Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV) can be a hassle, so much so that some folks spend entire work days waiting in line, bored and impatient. Photo Courtesy: Yeong-Ung Yang/Newsday via Getty Images Thankfully, many states offer online renewals and change-of-address services for those with motor vehicle licenses, especially in the wake of the COVID-19 pandemic and stay-at-home orders. Even if you just have a state-issued ID, you're likely able to change the address associated with it from the comfort of your home. Again, there's a nominal fee, but, if you have the option to update your license from home, it's likely worth skipping out on the DMV headache. Since these regulations and options vary from state to state, be sure to check with your local DMV ahead of your move. Vacations don't always go as planned. Sometimes unforeseen circumstances—like a tour that runs late or a family emergency—mean that you need to change your plans. Unfortunately, airlines aren't as flexible as most travelers. If you purchased a nonrefundable ticket, which is usually the least expensive, you'll have to shell out extra cash to reach your final destination. And don't expect these fees to disappear anytime soon: Airlines make nearly $2 billion a year from change and cancellation fees alone, so these costs are certain to stick around, and even rise. How Much Do You Have to Pay? Passengers change tickets for all sorts of reasons—and most of those reasons are subject to a fee. While most airlines don't allow name changes of any sort, if you need to book an earlier flight, modify the travel dates, swap an airport, or even made a mistake on your original reservation, you can expect to pay up to $250 to make a change. Our Airline Fees: The Ultimate Guide details how much each airline charges. In general, if you've purchased a nonrefundable ticket, expect a change fee to apply. Airlines across the board (except, notably, Southwest) apply penalties for modifying their lowest fare offerings. What Other Fees Might You Be Charged? Believe it or not, the airlines don't just make you pay the change fee if you want to alter your ticket. You'll also have to pay the increased airfare, if it applies. Even tickets that aren't subject to change fees require this extra charge. If your airfare is lower than the original itinerary on a nonrefundable ticket, though, most airlines won't offer you money back. Instead, they give you a flight credit that typically must be used within one year. Also, beware of how you try to change your ticket. Virgin America, for example, charges an extra $25 if you don't use an online form; Spirit charges an extra $10 to speak with a person by phone or at the airport. And if you don't book your ticket with the airline, you might face additional penalties, such as Delta's $50 external ticketing fee for changing tickets that were purchased from travel agencies (online or otherwise) and codeshare partners, unless the change can be made on their website. How Can You Avoid Paying Them? Luckily, you do have a few options to avoid paying the extravagant fees, although most of them still require you to shell out some extra cash. Change your ticket as soon as possible: Some airlines, such as Continental, Delta, and United in the U.S., and British Airways and Lufthansa abroad, offer a 24-hour window where you can amend or cancel a booking without penalty. This is probably the best option, since there is no extra fee, but it requires you to closely inspect your ticket after purchasing, and is not that helpful if your travel plans change after the 24-hour period has passed. Book a higher-class or refundable fare: While upgrading your ticket may cost you more initially, if there's any chance that you'll have to change your itinerary, it might be worth your while to book a refundable or non-restricted fare upfront. AirTran's business class; Alaska's full flex and first class; American's economy without restrictions, full fare economy, full fare business class, and full first class; Continental's full fares; Delta's refundable; Frontier's classic plus; JetBlue's refundable fare; Spirit's refundable fare; United's refundable fare; US Airway's refundable tickets; and Virgin America's fully refundable main cabin, main cabin select, and first class tickets can all be changed without any service fee (although you may have to pay the increase in airfare, if applicable). Fly standby: If your change of plans simply includes arriving at your destination a few hours earlier, flying standby is a much less expensive option. Standby rules vary by carrier, and a few still offer the option to travel on an earlier flight for free. You can also request a same-day confirmed seat for a small fee ($25 to $100) on Alaska, American, Continental, Delta, JetBlue, United, US Airways, and Virgin America. Elite frequent flyer members may not have to pay anything for same-day changes. Compared to their change fees, these confirmed seat charges are a significant discount. Of course, the downside is that flying standby on an earlier flight isn't a sure thing. A confirmed seat can only be offered if the flights aren't full, after all. Purchase travel insurance: There are many reasons to purchase travel insurance, but one of the benefits is that some plans will cover you for any reason, and reimburse you for change fees you might have to pay if your trip is interrupted or delayed. It's important to research which plan is right for you and your trip, but if you foresee any possibility of needing to switch your flights, then travel insurance is a great option. Change fees may also be waived on a case-by-case basis in the event of natural disasters or impending weather conditions. During the February 2010 storms, for example, most airlines offered change fee waivers before the snowstorms hit. The recent earthquake in Haiti also resulted in passengers being able to rebook or cancel without penalty. Your Turn Have you been charged a change fee in the past? Have you been able to avoid one?
