Dlivrd test video

And the winner of the 2025 Tiny Desk Contest is (drumroll, please) ... Ruby Ibarra! Hailing from the Bay Area by way of the Philippines, Ibarra is a rapper, singer and spoken word artist whose entry, "Bakunawa," stunned the Contest judges with its passionate delivery, genre-defying sound and multi-generational band. "Bakunawa" is performed in three languages (English, Tagalog and Bisaya), and tells the Filipino folklore story of the Bakunawa dragon who swallows the moon. It's also inspired by the birth of Ibarra's first child. "This song interprets the story as a metaphor for resistance and a battle cry against erasure," Ibarra says. "Much of Philippine history consists of colonization, imperialism and martial law — but on the other side of that is a rich history of Filipino people who have long resisted, organized and led revolutionary uprisings. This song, for me, is a statement that my daughter is my revolution and my hope that she will be liberated from the effects of our cultural history." In fact, Ibarra was pregnant with her daughter when she recorded her entry. "I wanted to step into motherhood breaking the generational trauma, celebrating and accepting all parts of myself and reclaiming my power," she shares. Ibarra says that every detail in her entry is intentional — including the band she put together to create it. She's accompanied by Ouida, Han Han and June Millington (yes, that's the June from '70s rock band Fanny) on vocals, as well as Anna Candari on guitar, Jojo Ramirez on drums and Camille Ramirez on bass. Ibarra told us she wanted these intergenerational artists to represent how oral mythologies are passed down over time. Each of our judges were floored by Ibarra's entry and agreed that she is a star. You may remember "Bakunawa" from when NPR Music's Bobby Carter and Robin Hilton featured it on the first episode of our Top Shelf series. Alt. Latino and Tiny Desk host Felix Contreras says: "Ruby is blazing a trail with a sound that many more people need to hear." Publicist Judy Miller Silverman agreed, noting that Ruby and her band have "a clear passion to embrace history and culture in a modern way." And this isn't the first time Ibarra's impressed NPR with her rich storytelling and musical talent. Her 2019 entry, "Someday," an ode to her mother, was featured on Weekend Edition. "I am what I talk about in my music," she said then. "I'm Pinay. I'm powerful. I'm fearless. I'm unfiltered." You can hear more from Ibarra in her own words by tuning in to All Things Considered this afternoon. Soon, Ibarra and her band will travel to Washington, D.C., to perform a Tiny Desk concert at NPR's headquarters. Then, they'll be performing in 10 cities around the country this summer, alongside Tiny Desk alums and new local artists. Rory McIlroy reportedly had to switch out his driver ahead of the PGA Championship.McIlroy's regular driver was tested and deemed to be nonconforming after he arrived at Quail Hollow earlier this week ahead of the second major championship of the year, according to Sirius XM PGA Tour Radio's Jason Sobel.As just reported by our team on @SiriusXMPGATOUR:Rory McIlroy's "gamer" driver was deemed non-conforming by the USGA on Tuesday. He switched drivers prior to yesterday's opening round.— Jason Sobel (@JasonSobelGolf) May 16, 2025Specifics on McIlroy's driver or why it was deemed nonconforming are not yet known.The issue, though, is a common one on the PGA Tour. Clubs fail these tests, which are conducted regularly by the USGA at Tour events each week throughout the season for multiple reasons. Drivers often fail simply due to extended use, as club faces can shift or break over time.For example, Xander Schauffele's driver was deemed ineligible by the R&A ahead of the British Open in 2019, and he had to scramble for a replacement at the last minute. All testing by the USGA is confidential. McIlroy has yet to address reporters since play started.McIlroy barely made the cut this week in North Carolina. He opened with a 3-over 74 on Thursday, and then he nearly blew it with back-to-back bogeys to end his round Friday. McIlroy finished 1-over and made the cut on the number.McIlroy has struggled off the tee and holds a driving accuracy of less than 36%. Only one golfer, Andre Chi, has been worse off the tee.McIlroy — who trails leader Jhonattan Vegas by 10 shots at the midway point of the tournament — will go off with Schauffele early Saturday morning.
