The image from the Arcade touch. Iby Freemium turned out to be popular (at least for some time bubbles), but an Australian watchdog organization is calling their equity in question. The Australian competition andThe Commission recently announced its plans to examine the 300 most popular free applications among Australian children to see if children and their parents were tricked into in-game purchases. A game the ACCC is looking for is The Simpsons: Tapped Out, a city building game with a freemium business model. Tapped Out was released for iOS in February 2012, and the Android version was released a year later. In May 2013, Tapped Out achieved a net turnover of $50 million for EA Mobile, a division of Electronic Arts. In Tapped Out, players build their own cities where the Simpsons and their Springfield fellow citizens live their daily lives. Players need donuts "the currency of the game" to buy premium upgrades, such as some buildings and new characters. Players can earn donuts by completing tasks, such as building new areas or playing for several consecutive days. Alternatively, players can buy donuts with real money. Prices for donut packages range from $1.99 to $99.99. Image uploaded by my iPhone. Undoubtedly, the game owes its success to the real world branding. Despite the frequent criticism of the post-highday seasons of the show, The Simpsons has a huge follow-up of fans with many hard. As such, EA Mobile has handled it with high prices for premium content in the game. A recent addition to the world of Tapped Out was the popular secondary character Disco Stu, which costs 180 donuts, which is $15. For a single character in a cell phone game, that price seems awfully expensive. After all, four Stus discs cost the same as a new game for Xbox 360, Playstation 3 or WiiU. The point of disagreement of the ACC is that children could spend a non-banal sum of money for in-app purchases without realizing that they are playing with real currency, not in-game. Earlier this year, Apple agreed to give more than $100 million in the iTunes store credits to solve a five-parent cause claiming that Apple did not set parental controls to prevent children from purchasing additional content for third-party video games applications. Since some of these apps are designed for small children, ACC concern is justified. Another concern is the fairness of the cost of premium content compared to the ability of players to gain content by playing the game. A spokesman for the Australian Communications Consumer Action Network informed the ACCC of a scenario in Tapped Out where players must wait 90 days for a corn harvest to grow or spend 1,060 donuts ($48.58) to complete the operation immediately. I used my real age when I started "The Simpsons: Tapped Out", but nothing would stop me from doing otherwise.uploaded by my iPhone. in my limited experience playing stages out (I love simpsons but I don't care about city games.) I found the difference between spending donuts and spending real money to buy clear donuts, but I understand why children might have trouble understanding the difference. and when the expectations are long to complete the objectives, objectives,The option to make them do more quickly will be particularly attractive. The argument that the gameplay is right depends on the market. Like other freemium games, TAPpato do not require players to buy extra items to advance through the game, but progress will be slower if they do not. Some will pay. Others will play the game without premium content or advance paid. If enough people do not love the game, its popularity will decrease. However, the problem of the fact that Freemium games are marketed fairly that guarantees a legal discussion. Toccc OUT requires players to enter their age, but there is nothing to keep children to type what they want. Of course, parents need to monitor their internet use of their children, but Apple, Android and app manufacturers for these platforms should not be free from responsibility to allow a potentially misleading apps. The ACCC survey is part of the development of the platform. There was a time when the newspaper and TV ads could say anything they wanted, but as the media evolved, restrictions became narrower, especially in children-oriented ads. Mobile apps are still quite new, so the rules of fair marketing must be further elaborated. Download and reproduce the Simpsons': Craped on PC.
