Notary near me bank

Short Answer: Chase Bank does not charge a fee for notary services, but only Chase customers can get a document notarized for free at participating locations. Not all Chase branches have a notary on-site, and others only have notaries available during certain business hours. Chase advises calling your nearest branch to ask if a notary is available and during which hours. For more details on getting something notarized at Chase, plus information on what a notary can do, see below. Is There a Chase Bank Notary Service Fee? Chase Bank offers free notary services for account holders at participating locations. We spoke with three corporate customer service representatives, as well as Chase branches in New York and Ohio, to confirm and gather information. We were told that not all Chase banks have notaries in the branch, and occasionally notaries work irregular hours and/or float between branches from day to day. Representatives advise that anyone needing a document notarized call their nearest Chase location and ask if there is a notary on site. When you call, it's also a good idea to verify what hours the notary is in, ask whether notarization is available for your particular document(s), and ask if you will need to make an appointment. What Does a Notary Do? A notary public acts as a certified witness to the signing of documents. Notaries must be objective, impartial, and independent when evaluating a document and signer. They cannot refuse to help you because of your race, nationality, religion, politics, or sexual orientation. A notary verifies that an official document has been correctly and voluntarily signed and that the person signing is who they say they are. The seal of a notary makes your signature more credible and may be required for certain documents. How to Get Something Notarized If you need to get something notarized, you'll need to bring the document to a notary near you. You'll also need to bring your driver's license, state ID, military ID, passport, or other government-issued photo ID. Answer any questions the notary may have and be prepared to possibly prove your signature or give a thumbprint. The notary will then give you a notarial certificate with a signature and official seal. Some notaries charge fees for their service, which vary but are typically in the range of a few dollars. Commonly Notarized Documents Certain important documents commonly require the signature of a notary. These documents may include: Advanced health directives Authorizations to add or remove a name from a title Bills of sale for motor vehicles Certificate of ownership or title application for a car Federal government applications and documents Guardianship agreements Handgun permits Homeschooling affidavits Identity theft complaints Medical authorizations for minors Powers of attorney Prenuptial agreements Promissory notes Property deeds Retirement and death benefit designations Wills Keep in mind that notary services are offered at the discretion of the bank and that Chase Bank may refuse to give notarizations based on the document type, document format, or incomplete information. Representatives for Chase Bank were unable to offer a full list of documents their notaries will certify; it's best to call your local branch and ask about your documents before visiting. Short Answer: Many banks and credit unions, such as Bank of America, Capital One, Connexus Credit Union, Fifth Third Bank, and Wells Fargo have notaries on staff, and customers can often stop in and have documents notarized for free. Some banks require that you make an appointment beforehand to make sure the notary is available. If you're not an account holder at the bank, you may be able to use the notary service, though there will likely be a fee. See below for the list of banks and credit unions with notaries, including information about availability and fees. Types of Notaries A notary public, or "notary" for short, is a person who witnesses the signing of important documents and confirms this by signing and affixing a seal. The notary verifies that the person signing is who they say they are, typically by checking a photo ID. The notary will also make sure that the person is signing willingly and not being forced into signing. While notaries can be found in different settings, they are all notaries public for their state. Each state has slightly different rules and laws concerning notaries. Some states require new notaries public to complete training, pass an exam, or have a background check; other states don't. Once they complete their state's designated process, notaries are considered public officials. In general, any notary public can notarize the signature on most documents you may need, such as auto titles, affidavits, and living wills or health care powers of attorney. There is also a special type of notary public called a signing agent. A signing agent is someone who has already been certified as a notary public in their state and has then completed additional training in the notarization of signatures for loan documents. The signing agent is likely certified as such and has passed a background check; he or she may belong to a professional association and might provide related services, such as acting as a courier for the loan documents. Banks With Notaries When you need a notary, your local bank or credit union is a good place to go. If you're an account holder, notary services will often be free. If you're not an account holder, you may not be able to use the service at all, and if you can, there is usually a fee. Below, we provide the list of banks and credit unions that provide notary services. Some don't provide any information about notary services online, so we contacted local branches for information. We've covered the largest banks in the U.S. — smaller regional banks probably also have notaries, and since they're local they might be more willing to accept non-customers. It is worth checking with your local bank to see if it has a notary available. See the table below for information about banks and credit unions with notary services, and click on any bank for more details.
